Like so many immigrants before him, Brazilian Guile Branco sought a better life in America. But once he arrived in the U.S., he discovered the hard realities of being a stranger in a strange land. Nevertheless, a stern dedication to succeed saw him through, and now Guile is living his American dream.

Guile's story begins in Brazil, when he began taking acting classes and working out. His extreme workout regimen paid off for him: he went on to win three consecutive bench-press championships in Sao Paulo. At the same time his acting career began to head in the right direction too. He studied under Brazil's well known "Coffin Joe" Jose Mojica

Marins, and became a professional actor. His resume soon boasted soap opera appearances and countless theater performances.

After visiting New York in 1998, Guile decided to move to the U.S. to pursue an acting career, where he encountered all of the numerous obstacles that every actor knows very well. But he faced his problems, determined to build the life he wanted for himself. He never gave up, and eventually he was cast in several independent films, and even landed an Off-Broadway singing role!

By 2006, Guile received his green card. Then, the idea of producing his first movie came to mind. Because of his passion for health and fitness he decided to produce a documentary about bodybuilding and powerlifting. He went back to the gym with a vengeance, earning an award at that year's Tribeca bodybuilding competition.

In "Camille"

"After making it to America, I had to stop dreaming and start "acting." Against all odds I am making my dreams reality. Nothing can stop me now."

In 2007 he moved to Los Angeles to further focus on his acting career and start getting footage for his film: Why We Train. After eight more months of hard work his film was accepted for a Premiere screening at Universal City Walk September 30th, 2008, where it screened to sold-out, enthusiastic audiences, and went on to win two awards.

Guile became an American citizen in 2011. He is now becoming well established in Los Angeles as a versatile, cooperative team player. With roles in several more independent films and a television pilot, a lead in a Capital One national commercial, lead roles in the tv shows 1000 Ways to Die and NBC's The Match-Off, his dreams are finally becoming his reality. (His demo reel can be seen on IMDb.)

But there is still much more to come for Guile Branco.
